Since the Adulteration Act has come into operation, several large seizures of various; mixtures, pretending to be Tea, and the labours of competent analysts, bave brought to light the existence of adventitious elements, many of them injurious to health most of them disgusting, and all of their intented to defraud the ignorant or careless nurchaser. The sale of such spurious products comes within the scope of the Adulteration Act, whether we regard that measure as designed for the protection of the public health or for the repression of commercial dishonesty. But it is obvious that the iniquitous traffic can only be kept in bounds by the imposition of frequent and severe penalties upon the offenders; and here we are met by an. bjection which, appealing to our sense of justice and fair play, compels us to pause. The retail grocers, who are of course the persons on whom the law lays its grasp when the sale of adulterated Ten is detected, protest that they are made responsible for fraudulent practices to which the article was subjected before i came into their hunds, the results of which they profess themselves incapable of detecting. and for which they disclaim any responsibility The wholesale dealers put forward in substance the same plea. They allege that the spurious Tea which is complained of, and, which has been the subject of recent prosecutions, is in fact adulterated in China. There seems to be no doubt that this allegation is founded on fact. writing. Sir Thomas, Fremantle and his colleagu, a expressed a very strong opinion that the existing staff of the Customs was neither adequate in point of numbers nor competent in point of knowledge to make, such an examination of imported Ten and similar articles as would, with a certainty, detect and exclude spurious products. This cannot be denied; but it is urged, on the other hand, that the staff may be increased and supplemented by a body of professional amalysts; and, if the duty of the Government to guarantee the purity of imported articles be conceded, the expense will not be allowed to stand in the way. A more serious dijection is that the necessary interference with the trade, consequent on the establishment of any system of inspection in bond, would deal a blow at British commerce by diverting from our ports the large quantity I Tea, amounting on the average to more than 30,000,000lb. per annum, which is intended to o re-exported, and which, if delayed or exposed to the risk of confidention, would be certainly warehoused by preference in foreign countries. We confess we do not think much I the difficulty of deciding what is and what is not adulterated Teu; a few simple rules could of easily drawn up for the guidance of inspectors or analysts, which would protect "gunpowder," green Teas, or "orange-scented against the penalties which would rightly attach to " Lie Tea." In fact, it appears to us that the commercial argument against inspection is the only one which deserves cousideration. The Commissioners of Customs, in their second Report, evidently feel that the extensive powers for the appression of adulteration now intrusted to the Local Sovernment Board relieve them from a very onerous responsibility; and, doubtless, if the nepection of imported Tess and similar articles I food should be made compulsory, it will be Charles Lindross, P. U. 41, sworn, stated, on at least two essential particulars; it has presonded discuss the following remonstrance to the art of analysis, and subject to the rule of Mr. Stausfield's Department. We find little difficulty nagreeing with the Marviebone Vestry in the suggestion that " the Government might frame regulations which would protect, the public to a very great extent, and prevent in a great measure, the delivery from the Customs of adulterated Ten and other produce." Only when such regulations are being considered, their effect on the import trade must be taken into account. In the meantime, we may hint that the retail dealers, however innocent of the and punished, muy easily clear their characters by declining to deal with wholesale teamerchants who will not guarantee the purity of the article they supply. The wholesale merchants have, both in China and lat home; abundant opportunities of ascertaining whether the produce they sell s genuine, or not. If they sell adulterated produce, they do so knowingly, or with that gross negligence which the law considers equally culpable with wilful wrong. The public, too, may protect themselves by insisting, wherever CHINESE TRADE. The Commercial Report of Mr. Malet. Scoretary of the British Legation of Peking, just the 1872 the trade between Chinas and foreign nations increased from £45.915.193. (in 1871) to £47,563,805, the exports rising from £22,458,162 to £25,115,965, but the imports falling from £23,457,028 to £22,447,839. The Customs' revenue rose from £3.738.715 to £3.892.878. mport duties fell from £1,282,663 to £1,225,363. and the coast trade duties from £139.686 to £183.287: but the export duties increased from £2,128,194 to £2,313,328, and the transit dues from £69,906 to £90,157.—It is noticed as satisfactory that the revenue from this source has increased with rapidity in the last two years, as it shows that the system must be working more smoothly than it did. A great part of the increase is attributed to the authorization accorded in some places to the Chinese to forward goods uto the interior under their own names. The trade between Great Britain and China shows an increase from £20,683,286 to £21,662,895; the exports to Great Britain rose from 611.942.608 to £12.908.633, and the imports 1to £8,755,761. Lither he left England without inquiring, in which case he is guilty of the grossest infamy; or he made inquiry: and, the latter, why dail he not see that a document so terribly dangerous as the scaled packet was destroyed forthwith?" Dr. Kenealy admitted the difficulty. There were many difficulties in the case. The mill at Sevington, for instance, had been confounded with "the grotto," in which latter place it was more likely that the seduction really took place. "In the gratto, do you say ?" asked the Lord Chief Justice. astonishment. Yes, Dr. Kenealy did mean the grotto-the place of which he had put in photographs, "But the photographs disguised they reflect the deepest discredit upon those presented to her. Dr. Kenenly argued, between trees in winter and trees in summer; and was beyond all doubt demonstrated the evidence that something terrible must have happened in June or July to perpetually exclude Roger from Tichborne. The defendant it was true, had not always told his tale with exactitude. He had sworn incorrectly as to places and times. But then Lady Radeliffe stood in the same condemnation. She had never been alone with her consin outside the park. There was, consequently, oath against oath; and he (Dr. Kencaly) should be quite content if the jury came to the conclusion that Lady Radeliffe and the defendant were a counter of liurs together, and were so to retarn an open verdict.; "But." said the Lord Chief Justice, " cither the thing was so, or it was not? You have sitting below you the man who says he did the deed. He surely must know where sitting below you, you omitted to cross-examine governess, and was in treaty for a situation at ther, in different sizes; also, the GLADSTONE Lady lindeliffe as to either time, place, or circumstances." It was so, Dr. Kenealy admitted. But then the Claimant was a man, to whom no ordinary rules were applicable. He -ind never said a word about a most important conversation with Gibbes—a conversation which was in itself almost conclusive of his identity-until days after Gibbes had left the box. "That may be so," the Lord Chief Justice replied; "but if you had intended to suggest the grotto as the exact place, you should have applied to your client for instructions." "You may ask this man," replied Dr. Kengaly, "but he will not always tell you.

But even more wonderful is the thought of the enormous rate of motion with which that vast orb is being carried along with its attendant family ceeding about five hundred times the velocity his attendant family is carried along with him. But besides this motion which they share with him, these orbs (which no eye perceives without telescopic aid, so completely are they lost in the glorious light of their ruling planet) are themselves travelling rapidity. Mendelssohn, who knew by heart what the other could only aliude to, agreed with him in some things and differed in others, but was most enthusiastic about the instrumentation. "How the orchestra is treated, and But he lives for us only in this invitation.what a sound it has!" cried he. The tone of voice in which he uttered this kind of thing still rings in my ear; but I am convinced that such utterances were more the result of a natural endeavour to imitate one's pet masters than the real expression of his To nature, which was always intensely modest. The discussion even got as far as Beethoven, whom Andre had often visited in Vienna. The worst thing he could find against him was his manner (so to speak) of composing, into which this learned theorist had had glimpse. For instance, he told us that he had seen the manuscript of the A major symphony, and that there were whole sheets left blank in it, the pages before and after which had no connection with each other. Beethoven had told him that these blanks

"What to do with children in the holidays" is now puzzling a good many parents. The summer vacation is pleasant enough, but six weeks at Christmas, with perhaps as many boys, and in a limited space perhaps, is undoubtedly trying. They cannot be for ever At the Royal marriage a scene-escurred at | painting, or cutting out pictures for a screen, of the swiftest express train.
